twenty fiddlers with which the good city of Paris by one mighty effort entertained Louis XIII, and Anne of Austria at one of the greatest official halls in times of yore. Why.

he wax candles alone the other night were 0.000, to cay nothing of the gas; and as to the £2,000 which the same municipal authorities invested in flowers when Queen Victoria graced trifle compared with the waggon loads of flowers and shrubs which kept rolling in for weeks not a profusion of plants rich with the hues and cents of Paradise. Particular mention is made of one gallery, actually turned into a grove, long, cool, and silent, and dimly lighted with coloured lamps and Chinese lanterns, out of which you issued into the ballroom, into one blaze of light, blaze of diamonds, blaze of stars indicrosses, of lace and epaulettes, and into the rush of half the fair women and half the great men of the four quarters of the world. In the Dour d'Honneur, on the crystal canopied stair-rise, in every saloon were fountains, jets d'eau, cascades, Undine in all shapes, water cveryoothing, cooling, relieving the somewhat heavy fragrance with which the air was faint, its lulling sound blending dreamily with the strains of 250 musicians, those strains themselves being buzz of voices. That, after all, was the main, if nor the only drawback to the splendid gathering. Too many were there. Eight thousand invitations had been issued. Thirty-five thousand had been applied for. People drove half round Paris to get to the place, and had to walk a mile to achieve the feat after all. The Rue de Rivoli and the Boulevards are described as resembling "the Clapham-road on the Derby Day." Inside, fully one hour before the doors were thrown open, crowds had taken up their position to see the Emperors and Kings go past: rows of ladies standing on chairs bar ricaded the halls and salcons. The apartments were all but impassable from beginning to end.

Progress was impossible; the bayoc of skirt and flounces was awind; and many were the fair once who went home dragggled and ruffled, able to bonet that they had been, indeed, but at a loss to recollection of all present. Emperors and Kings not excepted. Such are the advantages Paris possesses over all the cities of the world when she undertakes to play the hostess to the Crowned Heads of Europe. She lives under the rule of a First Magnetrate to whom "money is no ob-

The Prefect and his Council tax Paris for the good of Paris. Paris is the apple of every Frenchman's eye. The remotest provincial has a vested interest in the common capital of the nation. The liveliness of its Boulevaris, the grandeur of its monuments, the glitter of its shops, the thousand columns of its cafes, are part and parcel of the Frenchman himself. It is no wonder if the mere mention of the "Lord Maire" of London exercises so powerful a spell over the imagination of the Parisians. "It y a Maire et Mayor," they should be told. The Lord Mayor is also a First for such halls or dinners at the Guildhall or the Manaion-house as may be given within his year's tenure of office his Civic Lordship has no such inexhaustible purse to draw upon. For a ba-zear in Hyde Park, or a greeting to Garibaldi, or even the reception of a Sultan, and, indeed, for a variety of matters of infinitely greater moment, we depend on the voluntary system. Our displays may be shabby in comparison; our London may be homely; barely meant for item of their bills, call there to account to the uttermost farthing. They manage such things differently, if not better, in France. There is a tacik understanding between the French people and their ruler that Paris shall be unrivalled smong the cities of the earth, that it shall on any emergency be able to exercise such splen-did hospitality as may exceed all comparison, and distance all emulation. For these purposes the master builder and the
